“ life's just a series of "should I or shluod I not", isn't it? As you say, it's a good thing to keep in mind that nothing is written in stone on this planet, but on the other hand one shluod not dwell too much on such thoughts. For me too it is a constant battle of the mind, but I guess that's how it has to be. Be sad and thoughtful when you feel like it, but also enjoy life whenever there's a chance. And I think a person only dies when nobody remembers him or her anymore... and that's quite an encouraging thought. Leave a good impression - like your friend did - and you might be remembered forever.Oh, and btw.: I thought your article is very well written!

“ My deepest sympathies to Mary's family. I am a close friend of Mary's sister, Trudy, and have met Mary several times and liked her very much. We had some fun times together. I am so glad she is at peace now and no longer suffering.

“ My prayers are going up for you. Mary will be missed, her kindness and sense of humor will never be forgotten. Be strong & remember this. Time will NOT heal your wounds or the pain of missing her, BUT it will teach you to deal with the it. Try and remember the times you laughed together.

“ so sorry, I've been there myself and know the loss. She was a very solid person and very strong. I loved talking with her and we could share so many memories. We laughed about life and just took it in stride. I will miss her and wish I had spent more time with her. Time does heal and you will be alright, but you will always miss her.
