“ As well as my story, I wish to send my deepest condolences to all of the friends and family Steven left behind. I can't say that I know what you feel, the exact way you hurt, but I can say that I am truly sorry for your loss. I knew his impact on people. I knew from the limited interactions that he was a good man. Just know that Steven now rests with all of the people we have lost before him. He is at peace. He no longer suffers. I know he loved deeply, and that will never stop. Find peace in the things that remind you of him. Catch glimpses of certain things in life calling out to you. Witness the most beautiful sunset. Anything. Just feel the feeling of peace overwhelming your body. Know that it may be his message to you, telling you that he's okay. It will take time, but in the meantime, celebrate the memories you have of him. Find things about him that made you laugh and smile. Feel his joy once again. Again, it takes time. Heal. He's still with you.

“ I remember a time where Steven and I were with Tiffany and made a late night trip to Taco Bell. We arrived back to her apartment to be greeted by the smell of smoke. We investigated and drove to the next street over. We saw a house engulfed in flames. We didn't see a single light on. Steven bravely went around back, where there were animal crates and the largest flames were, to check windows and doors for signs of anyone. We checked the front. We immediately called the fire department and started knocking on all the neighbors' doors to alert them to the nearby danger. We heard sirens within minutes. We woke up an entire neighborhood in the middle of the night, in the middle of the week, to ensure their safety. We were across the street in Tiffany's truck bed, eating our Taco Bell, waiting to talk to the fire marshall. He commended us for our actions and got our stories. The owner of the house, luckily, wasn't there at the time, and no one was hurt.
